Adjusting Color Balance

In a sunlit scene, the warm color of the sun and the cool color of the sky should balance out so that they appear almost white where they overlap. Areas where the sun is blocked so that you see only skylight may look blue. If you render your scene with the sun and all of your skylights visible, you can see the overall color balance of your scene.

You might want a golden yellow overall tint for your scene for a late afternoon or sunset, or a blue tint for dusk or a gloomy overcast day. For a normal daylight balance, however, you don't want your full scene to look blue tinted or yellow tinted overall. You may need to go back and adjust the sun's brightness or color to achieve a natural-looking balance and make it cancel out the blue of the sky.

Figure 4.5 shows the result of rendering with the sun, the spill from the sun, and the sky illumination, all together. Although it still lacks the bounce light that will tie it together, you can see the overall daylight look already appearing in the image.

Sunlight and skylights are combined to create balanced daylight illumination.
